SHORT STORY OF THE DAY •••••••••••••• HIS REVENGE ON HIS RIVAL.

From the New York News, I hated him from the first to the last; I hated him with an intensity that has never died-1 hate his memory yet. Perhaps he was not to blame, though, after all; perhaps not. I am an old man now, and most of the past is faded into oblivion, but that of the past is faded into oblivion, but that portion of my life which relates to him is as fresh in my mind to-night as it was lifty years ago, when we were clerks together—Jed Aarchmont and I—in the great shipping house of Hailburton & Warmouth, Arrant street, Markeyboro.

Jed was very handsome, and I hated him for that, for I was piam and insignificant in appearance, and the comparisons drawn by every stranger who entered the counting room made me ill natured. Before Jed ever really did me wrong I hated him, hated him instinctively. I hated him for his elegant manners and comparisant ways. I hated his handsome, boylish, radiant face, with its golden frame of waving hair, and its blue, beaming, hopeful eyes. I hated him for his merry laugh, his melodious which hated him serry laugh, his melodious its blue, beaming, hopeful eyes. I hated him for his merry laugh, his melodious voice; hated him for his line, slender figure, als graceful walk, but I hated him, yes, I hated him more than all for his influence over Marjorie Haliburton. Marjorie was the only child of the head of our firm, and a girl whom I had learned

Marjorie was the only child of the head of our firm, and a girl whom I had learned to love with all the strength of my mind, my heart, my soul, and yet I never told her; and she loved me, too, I know she did, before Jed Marchmont showed his handsome face in Marleyboro.

Marjorie was not beautiful. I was conscious of that. Many scarcely thought her a pretty miss, but to me from the first to the last, she was the fairest, dearest, sweetest and most lovely of women.

Jed fell in love with Marjorie, and Marjorie fell in love with Marjorie, and Marjorie fell in love with Jed, God pity me! before they had been acquainted through a single spring day.

After 4 every evening he would stroll across the street to Mr. Haliburton's and chat with and make love to the girl my heart was breaking for. Oh! how I hated him as I hid in the shadow of the counting room doorway and watched them with their fair heads together, she busy with bodkin and needle, and he pouring in her ear, over and over again, all that was in his boyish heart. How I hated him as he hung at the gate wishing her good-night. I thought that I could see the little white hand tremble, as it waved an addeu to him as he strode away into the thickening twilight.

For months I watched them, and oh! the

as he strode away into the thickening twi-light.
For months I watched them, and oh! the bitter, bitter pain, the anguish and despair I suffered human tongue can never tell: After a while I followed him nightly to a certain palatial gambling den in Market place.

certain palatial gambling den in Market place.

I was not long in discovering what the magnet was that drew him thither. Nightly he played large sums of money into the bank; larger sums than I knew Jed Marchmont came by honestly; but I never said a word—only watched and waited and nursed the terrible vengeance in my heart.

Eventually Jed became restless and fidgety, and I guessed what was working on his mind. Then he became suddenly unusually industrious; all day long he bent over his desk, intently engaged with his pen, and I was extremely anxious to know what he was doing, for I knew the house required no such steady work. Some private affair, I felt certain. Perhaps he was writing love letters—love letters to Marjorie!

course I determined to fathom the

Of course I determined to fatnom the secret, and one afternoon, finding him wholly absorbed, I stole up behind him on tiptoe and looked over his shoulder.

He was writing over and over again across a sheet of foolscap paper the firm's signature, Hallburton & Warmouth.

What a hideous, fiendish joy shot into my heart as I comprehended what this meant. meant.
For the past few nights Marchmont had lost heavily at the disreputable establishment in Market place—lost more than he received for a year's salary, and a blockhead would have seen why he was practicing the signature of Haliburton & Warmouth mouth.

The very next afternoon I saw him draw up a check, for what amount I could not see, but I did see that it was a check on the Commercial bank, and the Commercial bank was where Hallburton & Warmouth dealt.

As he left the office I followed, well be-hind, but not out of sight, down Court check in exchange for my own, although it robbed me of the accumulation of years made me a very pauper.

But what cared I? Had not I lost all But what cared 17 Had not I lost all that made life dear—what were a few paltry dollars compared with my revenge? Years rolled away and Marchmont, for I watched him night after night, never again visited the house in Market place after the day of the forgery. He had squared all his debts undoubtedly, and started anew in life, with good resolutions and noble applications, secure in the receiver of his aspirations, secure in the secrecy of his aspirations, secure in the secrecy of his crime.

There was not a more industrious and faithful employe in the house of Haliburton & Warmouth than Jed Marchmont, not a better or more exemplary man in the city of Marleyboro.

"Marchmont has settled down at last," said one of the junior clerks to me one day, "and old Hal says he's the best business man in Marleyboro. Just look at the business they trust to him, Rolley—he'll be a millionaire."

I said nothing, but I thought, oh, heaven!

I said nothing, but I thought, oh, heaven! I shad nothing, but I thought, oh, heaven! I thought with demoniacal joy how swiftly my time was coming on. Rapidly was my enemy climbing the ladder of fame. Let him, let him—let him mount it—up, up, until he reaches the highest round, and then—and then—

The crisis came at last. Marchmont was Telephone 1109.
